Hongrong, August 9th, 1899. THE Russian rumour to which the Paris mourrespondent of The Timestrefors, though rat first blush rather startling, is not so wildly improbable as some persons might suppose. To begin with, NICHOLAS II, has never coveted place or power. He is a "their own. It was ever thus." young man of refined but simple tastes, can assure our contemporary people. He is a lover of free institutions, and he has no ambition to carry out a great programme, like that of his rude but He only craves for opportunities to better scheme was to bring about international disarmament as a means presumably of lessening the burdens of the nation, and though he has not succeeded immediately made in this direction. No doubt the comparative failure was due to the general want of confidence in Russian statesmen. The supply of arms to pirates and brigands Emperor is known to be a friend of peace, Hougkong and Macao are both in the same but the bureaucratic government of St. boat, and for the one to throw aspersions of its blessings. It is said he has had many bitter disappointments. What these may be we cannot positively say, but there can be little doubt that he regrets the failure of an immediate heir to the throne, both his children being daughters. The death of his says:-Two Englishmen arrived on the coast of brother the Grand Dake George, the Heir Apparent, was also no doubt a blow to him. From the account received here from Ilocos, it Mr. C. The devious ways of Muscovite statecraft can work better with a Prince who is not troubled with too many scruples or who is not too hampered with proclivities for peace at any reasonable price. But the retirement of Nicholas II. into private life would unquestionably prove a maleficent fact in European and doubtless, also in Asiatic politics. The present CZAR acts now, there is reason to believe; as a restraining influence on Russian politics, and prevents much aggression that would otherwise have been inaugurated. Nicholas II. has, it is believed, strong leanings towards Great Britain. He is nophew to the PRINCE of WALEs and rightly attaches great weight to the advice of his royal uncle. Whether the Grand Dake MICHAEL has any special predilections, or whether he would prove a pliant tool in the hands of ambitious Ministers, it is yet too early to pronounce an opinion upon, but it is not unlikely that he would be much more easily led, and in the in preventing the fire from spreading than there present situation of affairs this would not be likely to make for peace.
